James Plunkett

Gill &amp; Macmillan, €10.99

This is a very tidy paperback of Plunkett's lengthy 1969 novel about the Dublin Lockout of 1913. One of our major efforts at a nineteenth-century-realism kind of historical novel, its popularity owes much to Hugh Leonard's masterly adaptation of its documentary detail for the RTÉ version of 1980 (recently remastered in a collector's edition), a debt acknowledged here by the cover which has David Kelly as 'Rashers' Tierney and Brendan Cauldwell as 'Toucher' Hennessy sitting against an O'Connell St. background. The novel has also retained a literary respectability, motivated as it was by Plunkett's ambition to find a panoramic form that would accommodate a treatment of all social strata, especially the two Dublins of O'Casey's slums and Joyce's middle class. While no triumphant stylist, Plunkett impressively combines a resolute empathy with the working classes, an emphasis on dramatic characterisation, a snapshot attention to societal detail, and an equally honest and humane sense of the broader movement of history.
